A NEW YORK paper says that when the Harvard and Cambridge crews went into training for the great boat race, the American oarsmen were six or seven pounds each heavier than the English, but on the morning of the race this disparity disappeared, for the collective weight of the English was only six pounds less than that of the Americans.

The inference drawn is that the Americans were too finely trained, and that is probably true. We have seen a great horse lose in a race because he has been put on such scanty rations that he was distressed with perpetual hunger, and went upon the track, weakened by that hunger. After the race his usual feed was restored to him, and in a week he went on the track, and without any competition beat the time he had made under pressure in the great race.—Salt Lake Herald.
